

Campaign '78: here we go

by Jim Walser

"Hey, man, are you with Dick?"
"Hell, yeah, man, I was just waiting for him to get ahold of me."
"Yeah, well, things are pretty disorganized right now. He's a hard guy to get organized but, well, we could really use somebody like you."

"Well, I'm with you all the way, man. Just keep in touch."

"Okay, that's great."

Such whispered pledges of fealty were available in abundance in the basement of the McCrory Building in Columbia Tuesday night, as the young political lieutenants and their bosses -- Pug Ravenel, Brantley Harvey and Dick Riley -- gathered for a meeting of the Richland County Young Democrats, a gathering which looked and sounded much like the birth of Campaign '78.

Telltale signs were everywhere. The session unfolded in one of those sterile meeting rooms that the candidates will see far too much of in the next two years. It was a warm night in Columbia, suggestive of what many of the nights during the campaign next spring and summer will be like, and the temperatures in the small underground meeting room filled with a couple of hundred interested persons quickly accelerated. As per usual at these affairs, the microphone didn't work very well. And then there was the brown-nosing, the jockeying for position, the recruitment of aides, minds and bodies that will form the lifeblood of next year's campaign "organization."

If having consulted your calendar you notice that it is still technically the winter of '77, you may want to know why all the fuss about an election that is still 19 months away. Good question.

Most of the crowd and media were drawn by the prospect of seeing all four of the leading Democratic contenders for governor on the same platform (unfortunately, House speaker Rex Carter didn't show), an opportunity they are not like, during those at junkies, p campaigns. was a betw bonus, spring And for those espouse - whethe Rights Amendment. Richard B. Russell/Ts Shoals dam - it was an opportunity to get the candidates on record...early.

But, of course, most of the interrogators on hand Tuesday night were familiar with these candidates' positions on just about every major issue, and the candidates themselves seemed in no mood to stake out new territory

Anatomy of a Duke Power nuclear accident

by Elton Manzione

In the early morning hours of Jan. 18 nearly 50,000 gallons of radioactively contaminated water overflowed from a holding pond at Duke Power Company's Oconee Nuclear station near Seneca, and into the waters of Lake Hartwell. It was the final link in a chain of events which had begun three days earlier.

On Jan. 15 a monitor at the plant sounded an alarm which indicated a leak from the primary to secondary systems in a unit known as the steam generator. The generator carries hot water from the reactor through a series of 15,000 metal tubes into a condenser unit. Here the heat from the reactor water is used to turn a second system of water into steam to drive the turbines. It was in one of the 15,000 tubes that the leak occurred.

At this point the incident represented no threat to the surrounding area as both the primary and secondary systems are totally isolated and all the water in them is condensed and recycled through the reactor. It was in attempting to repair the otherwise minor leak that Duke caused the more serious spill.

While radioactive water was being drained from the primary system, in an effort to pinpoint the damaged tube, a gasket failed and sprayed radioactive water throughout the turbine building; seriously contaminating the building. Pumps were soon started to drain the water from the building into a temporary holding pond.

In an effort to save time Duke had pressurized the secondary system for leak testing while it was still filled with contaminated water, rather than draining it and refilling it with clean water. This was a "change in procedure" that Duke later admitted was not in accordance with Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) policy.

The contaminated water was pumped into a wastewater collection basin, which is designed to hold the contaminated water until it reaches a safe level, but the amount of water was too much for the basin to hold. Shortly after 6 a.m. the basin began to overflow into another pond, and by 8 a.m. the water was leaking into Lake Hartwell. In their report on the incident to the NRC, Duke said the "extent of this (overflow) activity was not known at this time."

On the afternoon of Jan. 18 Duke began running massive amounts of water through the adjacent Keowee Hydroelectric station to keep up with the large energy demand at that time. "Although not considered at the time, this proved sufficient flow to dilute the released water to within limits," the Duke report said.

On Jan. 20, at 8 a.m. the basin again began to overflow and Duke again put the hydro station on line to dilute the waste.

For nearly two weeks news of the spill was kept from the public, including staff and students at Clemson University which receives its drinking water from the lake, while several state and federal agencies monitored the results of the spill.

News of the spill was first reported in a page two article in the Feb. 2 edition of a small upstate weekly and was screamed from the page one headlines of several dailies the following day. The reaction of area residents was predictable—they were outraged at having been kept in the dark for so long. A hurried meeting with residents was arranged by Duke and the NRC.

The results of the meeting were for the most part disappointing to local residents, but they did receive a promise from Duke to be more timely in informing the community of "significant" events at the plant. Paradoxically, it is this "new era of openness" on Duke's part that may now pose the biggest threat to residents.

Before the Jan. 15 spill, the state's major dailies were comparatively silent in their coverage of operations at the plant. Following the spill, the dailies began to fall all over themselves in an effort to be the first to tout the latest malfunction, no matter how minor, reported under Duke's new "openness" policy.

Since Jan. 15, Duke has experienced two more leaks

The POLITICAL ECONOMY

Important social programs

Whilst the governor and the state legislature play political pin-the-tail-on-the-donkey with the Department of Social Services, it becomes too easy to forget that good social service programs are necessary to the functioning of our society.

Case 1: A pretty 16 year-old girl is raped by her father, with her mother's consent (it eases Mother's burden, so to speak). Her father then beats her, calls her a slut, and kicks her out of the home for good. The girl decides to hitchhike to another town, where her grandmother lives. But on the way, she is picked up by the police. Since she's a runaway and has no place to go, she is locked in a jail cell. Then the deputy sheriff rapes her, after which he lets two male prisoners out of their cells so they can rape her too.

Is this some horrid fantasy? No, it's merely a typical case. It happened not too long ago. Girls are being raped by their parents all the time. Children are, in many places, being locked up in cells for years, simply because they have nowhere to go. (And it is known that the girls' reformatory in Columbia was for years used as an "officers' club," where the inmates were raped at will by public officials.)

Case 2: A 13 year-old boy who had earlier been arrested for drinking a beer was again arrested, this time for truancy (he has an unrecognized and hence untreated sight problem - he needs glasses, and without them, he can't do schoolwork). The stern south'n judge sends the boy to reform school. There he is confined behind bars, in a large cell where he is beaten and raped daily by older boys. The young boy becomes withdrawn and weeps often in his bed. On a Christmas morning, he scrawls a crude tombstone on the wall by his bed, and while the other inmates are out, he hangs himself with his belt.

Another lurid tale? No, another actual case, and one that's not unusual, except that many of the victims of such brutalization somehow maintain a will to live, in hopes that their suffering will not be permanent.

Now enter that arch-enemy of every rightwing demagogue, the do-gooding, egghead, bureaucratic social worker (a suspected communist, no doubt). For case in point, witness the example of Ms. Bunny Jones. She's none of those things a rightwinger would surmise. Rather, Ms. Jones contradicts the idiot stereotype cherished by Republicans. She's a beautiful, intelligent and energetic young black woman who serves as human resources coordinator (a title she disdains) at the Richland County Family Court presided over by Judges J. McNary Spigner and Harold R. Boulware.

Ms. Jones handles programs that try to prevent the nightmares mentioned above, at least in Richland County. Her efforts, and those of the other staffers working for Judge Spigner, have contributed greatly to a Family Court system that keeps kids out of jail and in their families to the maximum extent. In fact, the Richland County Family Court and Judge Spigner have gotten some substantial national recognition for their success. (Psychologists Ken Wooden devotes several pages of his new book, "Weeping in the Playtime of Others," to Judge Spigner's work. The film "Children in Trouble" features an interview with the Judge. And the Family Court under Judge Spigner won a National Volunteer Award in 1974.)

Here's what the Richland County Family Court does: It makes sure children aren't locked up in jail with hardened criminals, by checking the jails every day. If a kid is found there, he's removed and placed under care of the Family Court. A social summary of him and his family is compiled. Then he's provided legal assistance from the USC law school. Meanwhile, a home economist visits the kid's home and seeks to help the mother and father with domestic problems. A pretrial intervention staff offers immediate counseling service for the child and his family. Then the Family Court can dismiss charges against successful enrollees, so they'll never be brought to trial and never have a record.

If the case does go to trial, then afterward, if the kid is found guilty, the Family Court tries to place him in a vocational rehabilitation program, where he can get job training. While a kid is on probation, a volunteer from the community works with him in a "big brother" relationship. Even children living in the Court's group house have volunteers to take them bowling, or to the movies. And there is an in-school volunteer program for children who seem to be potential juvenile "offenders." And yet another for handicapped children. And an annual summer camp for children who ordinarily could never attend one.

Are these the sort of social services the governor denounces as communistic do-gooding? Well, it was no more than blind fate that prevented the governor himself from living in the ranks of the unfortunate. Only fate, only blind chance, prevented the governor from being born dirt poor, to a prostitute mother and an alcoholic father who dabbled in armed robbery. Only fate prevented him from having to grow up in a succession of crime-ridden neighborhoods, with public schools that merely serve as holding pens for unwanted children.

It does well to remember that behind all the simpleminded cliches of Reaganite demagogery, behind all the caricatures of "welfare cheats" and "welfare bums," there are real people who need help, who cannot help themselves. And if helping adults in trouble is important, helping children in trouble is more important.

Congratulations

A jury of 12 Lancaster County citizens last week found Rep. Tom Mangum (D-Lancaster) innocent of charges that he had been involved in a ticket-fixing ring in the upper South Carolina county. Two witnesses at the trial testified that Mangum had accepted money from them and that at a later date tickets for driving violations were dropped. Another witness testified that he had paid Mangum $400 to nullify the revocation of his driving license for drunken driving. Mangum's attorney argued that the House member and chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee had agreed to help the witnesses but had personally accepted no money in return for his service. The jury was apparently convinced. After less than an hour of deliberation, the jury returned with a verdict of not guilty.

What follows is an excerpt from a story on the trial that appeared in The State March 10. "Martin" is Sen. John A. Martin (D-Fairfield) who represented Mangum. "Coleman" is deputy state attorney general J. C. Coleman who prosecuted the case:

Hazel Lloyd, another prosecution witness Tuesday, had made similar accusations against Mangum, saying that in 1973 he paid the representative $350 after being cited for driving under the influence. He too feared losing his driver's license.

Mangum said he had talked to Lloyd about the violation.

"He asked me if I could help him or get anybody to help him," Mangum testified. "I said I would try."

"Did you find someone who said they would or could help him?" Martin asked.

"Yes sir."

"Who?"

"A gentleman by the name of John Lee, a bondsman in this county," Mangum answered.

Minutes later under cross examination, Mangum told the court that Lee is dead, a victim of a shooting last fall.

Mangum quoted Lee as saying that for $300 to $350, Lloyd's license could be saved. "I told him (Lloyd) that he could leave the money with me," Mangum explained.

"The next time he (Lloyd) that he could 'The next time he (Lloyd) was in, he came with the money. I took it, put his name on it and put it in my safe. And it was there when John Lee came in later and I gave it to him," Mangum testified.

"Did you keep any of the money?" Martin asked.

"No sir," Mangum replied.

"Do you know what Lee did with the money?" Martin asked.

"No sir" Mangum repeated.

While on the witness stand, Mangum sat with his legs crossed and his left arm resting on the jury box railing. He would lightly pat the railing to emphasize a point and he spoke in a firm, self-assured voice.

His voice became louder with apparent irritation during Coleman's cross-examination, which raised questions about Lee's involvement.

Coleman asked why Lee wanted $300-$350 from Lloyd.

"It was to help him, help his save his license," Mangum said.

Coleman: "How could a bondsman save a license?"

Mangum: "I don't know."

Coleman: "Had he fixed tickets before?"

Mangum: "I don't know."

Coleman: "Had you asked him to fix tickets before?"

Mangum: "No. This was the first time I went to him for help."

Coleman: "Why go to him this time?"

Mangum (hesitantly): "I heard he could do this sort of thing."

Coleman: "Why didn't you suggest Lloyd go to a lawyer?"

Mangum: "He came to me for help. He knew all the lawyers in Lancaster if he had wanted to go to one."

Mangum returned to the House of Representatives on March 11 and was greeted by fellow House members with a standing ovation. Sen. Rembert C. Dennis of Berkeley told a House-Senate liaison committee that "I think we should collectively congratulate our esteemed colleague on being found innocent. This is a vindication of the confidence we had in him all along."

Westy

Westy: why I bombed

Westmoreland 'Glad' He Isn't Governor

That was the headline confronting readers of Charleston Magazine when copies of the March edition arrived this week. Retired Gen. William Westmoreland, former chief of Allied forces in the Vietnam War and currently a regular on the Merv Griffen-Dinah Shore talk show circuit as he hypes his book on the war ("A Soldier Reports"), took a quick look back in an interview at his abortive 1974 Republican gubernatorial quest. Of course, Westy was beaten in the first-ever GOP primary by one Jim Edwards, who was later (you may or may not remember) elected governor.

Seems as though Westy got his fill of politics in '74, just as "A Soldier Reports" indicates that he got his fill of politicians somewhat earlier. Here are a couple of questions and answers.

Q. Do you have any further political ambitions?

A. There is no way I could be encouraged, enticed or induced into doing anything like that again. I got my belly full of it. I won't make any bones about it.

Q. Do you think your involvement with Vietnam hurt your campaign?

A. No. Absolutely not. Positively not. You have to look at the facts. I carried every district except the First (the Low Country area) and Jim Edwards (a Charlestonian) understandably had that locked up. He is a very good politician who is well-known and who had made a contribution to the (Republican) party in the First District and foreign affair

by Val Stieglitz

The tremendous expansion of international economic activity raises a number of issues, none more important than the issue of political control. Every nation which accepts foreign investment must deal with the political influence of this economic activity, and the state of South Carolina is no different. The basic question is this: will South Carolinians be able to maintain political control over their lives, or will this power be slowly ceded to foreign firms dangling attractive economic bait and wielding significant economic clout?

South Carolina's governor's since at least McNair have made acquiring foreign investment a high priority. In 1969, under the McNair administration, South Carolina sent its first trade mission to Europe. The West administration sought money from abroad with notable vigor, expanding the search to include the Mid-East (mainly Saudi Arabia and Kuwait) and Japan. Governor Edwards has continued this general policy of soliciting foreign investment.

This commitment on the part of South Carolina's political leadership was timely. Combinations of events abroad were leading more firms to seek new areas in which to invest. Companies in the strong West German economy, having expanded domestically to high levels, were looking for profitable ventures in less competitive arenas. At the same time, Arab money was beginning to seek investment abroad.

And, where do companies invest? Where there is the greatest expectation of profit. We have to wonder, therefore, what it is about South Carolina that is so attractive to these profit-conscious foreign enterprises. What does it say about South Carolina, that we are so attractive to foreign investors?

"...The immediate question is, why has the economic benefit of foreign investment not filtered down to the working people? Why is our per capita income abysmally low?..."

It says, first of all, that foreign companies anticipate little interference with their operations. In most places, corporations must deal with both active labor movements and watchful governments. In a 1976 newspaper interview, Herbert Hergeth, President of Hergeth KG (with a metalworking plant located in Spartanburg) said "the right of workers to interfere in Germany makes it nearly impossible for good management to handle a company." He was voicing the common view that the best business environment is the one which offers maximum freedom of action to management. This is certainly available in South Carolina, for the state has neither a significant labor movement nor a particularly vigilant government.

The right-to-work laws have effectively kept unions out of South Carolina. Less than 10 percent of the state's workers are organized. From both a national and international perspective, this is a remarkable situation. Most U.S. states, and almost all the West European countries, are extremely unionized, a pressure that most firms would rather avoid. They can avoid it in South Carolina.

The absence of unions has, of course, ambiguous consequences. There is no doubt that foreign investors like the fact that organized labor is weak here. They expect fewer production problems and lower payrolls. Their expectations are met. In 1976, $425.7 million dollars worth of foreign capital investment was lodged in South Carolina, and the state was 4th highest in the nation in numbers of foreign manufacturing firms. This sounds wonderful, until we realize that, for the same year, South Carolina was 46th in the nation in per capita income. It is often said that foreign investment has had the effect of improving the wage-scale; in absolute terms, this is so. But in relation to national averages, the South Carolina wage-scale is archaic.

Unfortunately, though, no issue is black-and-white. While strong unions would undoubtedly hike the wage-scale, foreign firms would undoubtedly be less attracted to the state. Foreign manufacturing companies employed 2,260 people in 1976; jobs not to be scoffed at. Unionization would he had campaigned for Congress and done well on the Republican ticket. He had developed an organization and had gotten to know the people of the First District. It's logical he'd chew me to pieces in his home area. 'he people who were recommending strategy to me suggested that I kind of ignore the First District because they didn't think I could win it. So I didn't pay much attention to the Charleston area, which was a mistake. Still, I don't think it would have done any good. Edwards had the Republican party in the First District locked up.

Q. What else may have hurt you?

A. The thing which really hurt me decisively was the report that I had never voted in a Presidential election. As a military man, I had felt in the past I should exercise a non-partisan role and I leaned over backwards to do so. I felt it would compromise my integrity to vote in a Presidential election. So when I was asked if I had ever voted, I said no, because I was in a profession which was non-partisan. The way that comment got twisted around in the rhetoric of the campaign was that 'how in the hell are we going to elect a governor who has never voted?' Frankly, many of the voters could not reconcile that. That contributed most to my defeat, as a campaign issue.

Q. Would you consider going to work with the state government?

A. I haven't been asked. Governor West had me working with him. But the Republican administration hasn't asked me to do anything.

Q. Do you read something into this?

A. (laughing) I don't necessarily. Matter of fact, I'm rather glad they haven't because I am now involved in a great many other interesting things. But I'd certainly prefer to do a little less traveling. Most of what I'm doing now happens out of the state. But that's the way the ball is bounced. I've made one overture (to the Republican administration) on something I thought I could contribute but it wasn't well received.

Q. To the governor's office?

A. I'd prefer not to go into that.

Porno update

Fifteenth Circuit Solicitor "Bud" Long was back in the news this week with his porno show - appearing before the S.C. Supreme Court to "show cause" why he shouldn't be prevented from prosecuting the distributor of alleged pornographic materials in Horry County. Long appeared before the Horry Grand Jury last week seeking an indictment against the Florence based Pee Dee News Company. After the Grand Jury voted to return an indictment against the company, the distributor was off and running to the Supreme Court for help.

The Supreme Court resembles the "Gong Show," except here it is more like the "ding show." Spokesmen from each side - in this case Long and Pee Dee's attorney Harvey Golden - participate in a ceremonial 20 minute debate after submitting briefs, outlining their arguments, to the high court. Each side has ten minutes to emphasize whatever they wish and justice appropriately "dings" each contestant when the time is up. If you insist on carrying on, of course, you get the ding, ding, ding, ding ding.

Pee Dee charged, in their petition, that Long had sought to "try his case in the newspapers" and in doing so had made it next to impossible for Pee Dee to receive a fair trial in Horry. It claimed the magazines taken by Long had been seized illegally. In addition, Golden argued that South Carolina's obscenity law is so vague as to render it unconstitutional.

Long insisted he only answered questions regarding the law for the press and denied he was seeking to try the case in the media. While he admitted he had not followed the state obscenity statute's guidelines in seizing the pornography - which would have required officers to have obtained a search warrant or to have at least purchased the magazines they confiscated - he argued the officers acted under the "plain view" doctrine. Under the "plain view" doctrine an officer can seize contraband found in plain view. Unfortunately, no one asked how, under the "plain view" doctrine, an officer could confiscate part of a parcel of contraband and not the rest (since Long had officers seize only once copy of each magazine).

Later on in the day, the Supreme Court refused to take jurisdiction in the case, a green light for Long to pursue his prosecution.

In other porn news, 14th Circuit Solicitor "Buster" Murdaugh sent law enforcement officers to stores in Beaufort County to inspect for hard core pornography. According to the Beaufort Gazette deputies told businessmen in the area to remove magazines displaying nudity.

Beaufort County Council Chairman Arthur Horne came out against Murdaugh's actions, saying there is an "inherent danger" in allowing law enforcement officers to decide what types of reading materials can be sold in stores. But county attorney Ladson Howell said no one was trying to tell store owners what they could sell. He said the report from the county's Obscenity Committee - the only one of its kind in South Carolina - would recommend only that nudity magazines be "tastefully displayed," so as not to be visible to children or to adults who don't want to see them. He said there was no ban on such publications in the committee's report.

Bell's tolls

They call it "usage-sensitive pricing."

If that sounds like the latest euphemism promulgated from the pointy-headed bureaucrats that brought us such terms as military "incursions" (that's actually undeclared war accompanied by border-to-border bombing), "input," "prioritizing," and the Department of Social Services, then you're only half wrong.

Actually it's part of the latest scheme, uh, plan from your friends at American Telephone and Telegraph (AT&T). AT&T wants to begin "usage-sensitive pricing" within the next few years, a plan whereby the company (and most independent telephone companies, too) will charge for local phone service the way you now pay for long-distance calls: by the number, length, distance, and the time of day of your call. That system would replace the flat monthly rate that most of the nation's 149 million phones are billed now.

According to a story in the March 5 National Observer, studies indicate that the average phone user's bill would drop five to ten dollars per year if such a system were used, and that the savings would exceed $500 million nationally. No one has figured out quite why AT&T wants to install a system which would cost them half a billion dollars a year in revenues, but what the hell...

There are drawbacks, of course. The Observer reports that "if you're an infrequent caller who doesn't talk long, your bill would drop. If you're garrulous and make lots of calls, it'll go up. You'd pay less to call a neighbor than someone 20 miles away, but you'd pay more to call during regular business hours than early in the morning, late at night, or on weekends." In other words, you would pay more when you most need the phone service.

Also poor people would be adversely affected. Most surveys indicate that persons earning less than $3,000 per year make more than twice as many calls per day and talk longer than higher-income customers.

Understandably, consumers are by and large unimpressed and quite skeptical of AT&T's largesse. "It's the unknown that's troublesome," one AT&T official assured the Observer, adding later, "It's been a difficult thing for us to communicate the benefit. But for the majority of our customers we're sure it's going to mean lower phone bills."

Sure, buddy.

Correction

In last week's story on the confiscation of pornographic materials in Horry County, 15th Circuit Solicitor J.M. "Bud" Long was identified as the official who initiated the arrests of seven Ohio golfers found playing poker at a Myrtle Beach hotel. Long told Osceola this week he had nothing to do with the arrests and "read about it in the papers." Further investigation reveals that the golfers were arrested by a pair of county policemen assisted by a Myrtle Beach city policeman while playing poker in the lobby of a hotel within the city limits of Myrtle Beach. The county policemen made the arrests after clearing the matter with Myrtle Beach's chief of police. The golfers were taken before a local magistrate and eventually fined $60 each for violating state gambling laws.

The point of our story was that both the gambling raid and the confiscation of sexually explicit materials from the stores of local merchants have resulted in outcries from local businessmen who believe the actions by law enforcement officials may discourage golfers and other tourists from visiting the resort.

A North Myrtle Beach newspaper reported last week that "promoters of the resort area complained that the arrests had done more harm to tourism on the Grand Strand than thousands of dollars (in advertising could undo)." Local civic and business leaders were upset enough about the incident to arrange to reimburse the golfers for the fines incurred and even for the money lost when a $40 pot was confiscated during the raid. The golfers, according to the North Myrtle Beach Times were also "honored with free dinners, cocktails and handshakes of apology from the South Carolina golfing capitol."

ERA and the next 100 years

Dear Editor:

The Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) which is now before the General Assembly has generated much controversy due to misunderstanding and fear.

There have always been those individuals who feel it necessary to deny rights and privileges to others in order to bolster their own status and self-image. They are afraid of being measured on their own merit and so loudly proclaim lack of merit for others.

The Equal Rights Amendment is very clear and concise:

Section 1: Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Section 2: The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Section 3: This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

Those who say the ERA will mandate homosexual marriage, coed toilets, etc., are only projecting their own hangups and fears.

As we can see, the amendment does not offer any more, or any less, than equal treatment for all our citizens.

As we enter the third century of this great country, let us not continue to deny equality to over half our people. This was the promise of America 200 years ago. Let us finally realize that promise fully.

Sincerely,
Mrs. Judy Parker

(In) Justice

To the editors:

The sentence handed down by our (in) Justice Dept. on Larry Flynt (Osceola, Feb. 25) makes me wonder what may happen to me the next time I get stopped for violating a speed limit. If Larry Flynt can get 25 years for publishing a porn magazine, Rubin Carter can get life due to the testimony of a known perjurer, Claudine Longet can get a month for killing a man, a college professor can spend five years in the tank for possessing a weed that some people use in order to tolerate glaucoma...legally.

And the streets abound with criminals with great lawyers, because of legal loopholes and reasons that I could go on about for pages. You can't help but question the competency of those doling out the sentences and of those that put them there. Some bad judgment here is evident. But what is being done to make sure the law is applied equally to those that have and to those that have not?

Can we rest assured that the First Amendment will be the ONLY freedom taken away from us? Can we be sure that something we consider minor won't have us in one of these "fiction-like" situations? I think not. I think our liberties need to be reestablished. I know Larry Flynt thinks so.

Opposing views are welcome but not thought highly of.

Yours anxiously,
David True

Free market troubles

Dear Sir:

Your Ed Meadows (Osceola, Feb. 18) denounces the idea of a free market because such a system has never existed. He's correct in that a totally free market has never been allowed to take place, but everything good that has ever happened was an idea first.

One thing is for sure, the economic ideas that Mr. Meadows espouses have been allowed to take place, and the results of them should be proof enough that almost anything would have been better.

The Keynes-Galbraith-Meadows approach to economics is simply this:

More government controls and more deficit spending are the only solutions to economic problems. All of the confusing, half-truthing, sophisticated rhetoric of Interventionists amounts to the same thing: Socialism. And Socialism is merely a system of distributing loot.

Very sincerely,

Charles T. Blackwell, Chair
Libertarian Party of S.C.

On the rights of non-smokers

Dear Sir:

I must admit that I failed to see any humor in Sen. Smith's recent attempt in the S.C. Senate to poke fun at Sen. Wise's responsible piece of legislation-The S.C. Clean Indoor Air Act. This act calls for proprietors or managers of public places to designate areas for non-smoking persons. As a member of the non-smoking majority, I think it is high time someone in the S.C. Legislature began to look out for non-smoker rights. Smoking is not only a disgusting habit but dangerous to the health of non-smokers too. If people must smoke, let them pollute each other!

I hope all non-smokers will join with me in supporting Sen. Wise in his attempt to protect the rights of all non-smokers.

Sincerely,
A. Ken Dawson

So high in trackability and so uniformly flat in frequency response, only the Shure V-15 Type III can out-perform it! A radically new, ultra-thin pole piece optimizes magnetic characteristics, cuts magnetic losses, flattens response across the entire range. Nude-mounted biradial elliptical stylus tip means lower effective stylus tip mass—and the ability to track today's "hot," heavily modulated recordings (at 1/4 to 1 1/2 gram forces) with ridiculous ease. Anatomy of a Duke Power nuclear accident in steam generator tubes, but in both cases the leaks were contained in the isolated secondary system. "Radioactive leak found at Duke plant," the headlines following the incidents read. "Spill disclosed at nuclear plant."

The leaks in the tubes themselves were relatively minor incidents, as any radiation was contained within the isolated secondary system. The papers, as usual, were reacting instead of acting. The papers were missing the obvious in their rush to be the first to report the latest minor malfunction at the plant. A close look at NRC reports on file in the public document room of the Oconee County library indicate Duke has experienced an historical problem at the plant, a problem the papers have chosen to ignore or have not bothered to find.

The major newspapers duly noted the three leaks this year but were either unaware or did not report the fact that Duke experienced four similar leaks in the final four months of last year. A close look at the NRC reports also shows the majority of the leaks displayed a peculiar point in common.

Although data on the two most recent leaks is not available as yet, detailed NRC reports on five of the previous leaks present a curious pattern. Three of the four leaks last year, and the ill-fated Jan. 15 leak all occurred adjacent to the "open tube lane," a radial row without tubes, used for inspection purposes. In addition two of five defective (but not leaking) tubes were found in the same area.

Previous to the outbreak of tube leaks last year, the Oconee facility experienced no problems with the steam generator, but after the four incidents in the latter part of 1976, Duke started discussions with Babcock and Wilcox, manufacturer of the reactor and steam generator systems in an effort to determine the cause of the failures.

At this point, no one at Duke is saying exactly what the cause of the chronic failures may be. Oconee Nuclear Station plant manager J. Ed Smith says engineers are attempting to define the cause of the problem but as yet have not reached any conclusions. "I wish we really knew for certain," Smith said. "The problem is being looked into." While Smith indicates he does not believe vibration is causing the rash of the tube leaks he said "it would be a little premature to rule it out entirely."

The NRC reports on file in Oconee County, however, indicate that Babcock and Wilcox engineers suspect vibration may be the problem. "A detailed stress/vibration analysis is being conducted on the tubes in rows 75 and 77," a December report said. Row 76 is the open tube lane, adjacent to which four of the five leaks in the last year have occurred. In addition to the stress analysis report, Babcock and Wilcox are involved in reviewing the Oconee station operating history and studying previous analyses and tests of the steam generator. Duke has also removed a portion of one of the leaking tubes which will be closely examined in an attempt to determine the cause of the failures.

There are other indicators that the Oconee nuclear station is experiencing vibration problems that were not anticipated in the original design of the facility. Early in 1976, Duke began experiencing problems with components known as "surveillance holder specimen tubes." The tubes are designed to hold pieces of metal, similar to the metal used to construct the nuclear reactor core. The metal can be removed from the reactor and examined to determine the effects of radiation and heat on the core structure.

In March of 1976 Duke discovered one of the tubes in a reactor that had been shut down for refueling was damaged. Dick Pierce, vice president for corporate communications, said a pronged disc holding the tube had broken. In April a second reactor was shut down for early refueling in order to inspect the specimen tubes, and again defects were found in the components. At the time, Duke officials attributed the failures to mechanical vibration.

Last summer the Nuclear Regulatory Commission expressed concern with what seemed to be similar problems in Babcock and Wilcox reactors at other nuclear facilities, and the NRC requested a meeting with the manufacturer. The results of that meeting were disappointing, especially to Duke.

Babcock and Wilcox, told NRC they had redesigned the tubes and were in the process of developing a way to replace them at the time the meeting took place. Babcock and Wilcox described the procedure necessary for the tube replacement.

Duke would have to remove all fuel from the reactor and move it to the spent fuel pool. They would then have to remove the core support structure from the reactor vessel and place it in storage in the fuel transfer canal.

After removing the fuel and core assembly the redesigned tubes would have to be installed under a water shield using specially designed long-handled tools operated from platforms above the water. Babcock and Wilcox said Duke would face the problems of drilling and tapping blind holes in the core barrel and shimming to obtain proper alignment.

"To date we have only developed a fraction of the tools necessary for the installation," B and W told the commission.

Even if the tools had been available, Duke had another problem. The company had no place to store the nuclear fuel and reactor core while repairs were being made. Earlier last year it was learned that Duke, along with most utilities, was using the spent fuel pool, originally designed to store used fuel until it had cooled off sufficiently to be transported, for use as long term storage basins. Duke, like most nuclear operations, has been caught with an increasing amount of exhausted fuel and no reprocessing plants to send it to. The pool, designed to hold the reactor core in the event of repairs or emergency, was glutted.

"In the event we had to remove the core for maintenance, the fuel in the pools would present us with a storage problem," plant manager Ed Smith said earlier this year. "But this is an unlikely possibility." By the summer it appeared that this unlikely possibility had come to pass.

Duke managed to avoid the problem, however. Rather than remove the reactor core and replace the specimen tube assembly, Duke requested that NRC allow the company to install the specimens in a reactor at some other site. The company argued that since conditions in a reactor of similar manufacture would simulate their own, such a solution would provide accurate data on the effects of heat and radiation on Duke's core structure even though the samples were hundreds of miles away in another reactor. The NRC approved the plan, and Duke will install the specimens in a reactor scheduled to begin operation in Florida this year.

Several physicists are skeptical of the solution suggested by Duke and approved by NRC. They believe an accurate duplication of reactor conditions is impossible. "I don't think you could have two models of any device and expect them to have the same performance characteristics," a structural engineer said.

In June of 1976 the NRC brought to Duke's attention another problem, possibly caused by vibration or stress during normal plant operation. This time the adequacy of the pressure vessel support systems was called into question, and again the NRC indicated a similar problem was being experienced in other B and W reactors, and possibly those of other manufacturers.

In a letter transmitted to Duke's vice-president of steam production the NRC requested Duke supply them with an evaluation of the adequacy of the pressure vessel supports. The vessel is a steel tank which surrounds and supports the reactor assembly.

The commission informed Duke officials a potential safety question had arisen since many reactor manufacturers had not taken into account certain loads when the supports were designed. The commission then went on to tie the support problem into similar failures in the specimen tubes and steam generators. "While the emphasis given in this letter deals with the reactor vessel cavity, our review may consider other areas in the nuclear steam supply system," the NRC letter said.

Duke officials deny the problems in the steam generator tubes, specimen holder tubes and pressure vessel supports are inter-related or traceable to the same cause. "I don't think any parallels can be drawn," Smith said, "some of the components are in the reactor and others are in the steam generator."

But some persons disagree with that simple assessment of the problem. "It's a little like saying the fuel pump and carburetor in your car are unrelated because they are two separate units. It's true, but there is an interrelationship," a Clemson university scientist said.

In addition to ignoring Duke Power's history of leaking tubes, the state's major newspapers have also failed to note other incidents that have occurred at the nuclear power facility. For example, on Feb. 15, at the height of concern over operations at the plant, Duke reported a "minor" incident to the NRC.

A reactor building containment isolation valve failed to close while being tested. Duke reported that paint on the valve stem may have prevented it from actuating. It was a seemingly minor problem that could have had serious implications. The valve, according to the NRC and Duke, is required to close upon receiving an emergency system activation signal. The purpose of the valve is to contain any radioactive contamination that might leak from the reactor itself to the reactor building and prevent it from escaping into the environment.

An hour and a half after the failure was discovered, a backup system of valves was finally made to actuate. Should an accident have occurred during that time any contamination leaking from the reactor could have entered the atmosphere outside the building. And should an emergency have occurred before the failure was discovered, the hour-and-a-half lapse experienced before the start-up of the backup system could have been critical. Yet no mention of the incident was ever publicly made by Duke, the NRC or the media - despite Duke's new publicity policy.

So while some people may be soothed by Duke's "new era of openness," a close look at the operation of the Oconee nuclear power facility suggests the existence of several problems that Duke is not about to publicize in a press release. And if the past track record of the state press is any indication, if Duke fails to put it in a press release, then you won't be reading about it in your morning paper.

'Dick & Jane's limited success

by Mike Smith

More than any other film currently claiming the title ("Silver Streak," "Thieves") "Fun With Dick and Jane" is the comedy "hit" of the season.

Exploiting the titles of the reading books which have introduced many a child to life in the wonderful U.S. of A., the film takes a rather jaundiced, amoral look at life in the '70s. It remains, like its source, a simple minded, simply stated primer, but the rules are for another game -- ripping off the system.

Poor Dick gets some bad news one morning from a soused boss (credibly played by Ed McMahon): he's been canned from his circa $35,000-a-year job as an aeronautical engineer. It's calamity on the home front, then, when wifey Jane agrees to give up French wines and junior's skiing lessons. But then, poor, poor Dick is spotted by the faceless bureaucrat down at the employment office while earning money on the side as an extra in an opera and loses his entitlement. And then, oh dear, dear, the food stamp inspector comes just as the family is about to sit down for the final blowout at the table.

And the real fun begins as the almost always-excellent George Segal and the refreshing Jane Fonda weave a blend of magic which is unusual on the screen. There is a rare combination, like William Powell and Myrna Loy's in "The Thin Man" or Cary Grant's and Rosalind Russell's in "His Girl Friday" or Tracy and Hepburn's in "Adam's Rib." The juxtaposition of these two actors is a stroke of genius. As Dick and Jane, the two act against and with one another to create credible, sympathetic adults out of what could have been petty characters.

In short, they rise miles above the script written by a trio including the Canadian novelist and humorist Mordecai Richler who previously teamed with director Ted Kotcheff for the film "The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz." Ever bit as amoral as this offering, "Duddy Kravitz" was about the rise of a young Jew, a character who created every stereotype for ridicule.

The earlier film is probably a better film, in technical, dramatic and literary terms, for here Ketchoff's work is outright sloppy in spots and the color of his film is positively ugly. For instance, the well-written scene in which workmen have arrived to roll up the front yard. Fonda is very funny playing upon the sympathy of onlooking neighbors, but the camera placement deflates what could have been comic action. The same is also true in a modeling scene which Jane is supposed to upset. The camera establishes the Rube Goldberg aspects of the room too long before A hits B.

And the script just cannot get itself organized. As plot summary suggests, this is a rather schizophrenic film. Instead of a continuum, the story is presented as a series of black-out skits, some of them building up to nothing, until finally becoming a lateral recounting of a super heist.

There are some truly amusing moments -- the visit from the food stamp official; the bureaucratic conversations between Dick and government agents; Jane's visit to her parents; the gardeners' reclaiming of house plants -- which suggest that a black-minded, satiric wit is in control. But that soon gives way to another segment, culminating in a comic chase, in which our heroes turn to petty crime before going for the whole enchilada.

The final segment, though, is a comic gem well worth sitting around for. Fonda deftly handles these scenes, balancing a cool and cautious facade against an on-the-edge desperation which keeps the character from just being another dizzy heroine in a heist film. Segal manages to look absolutely harried and still remain comic, and McMahon's "buffaloed" look tops off the hilarity appropriately.

"Fun With Dick and Jane" cannot live up to its original and more interesting commitment -- to satire -- but once it settles down to a what-the-hell witty comedy of morals and manners, at least it doesn't disappoint. Thank goodness, though, that Segal and Fonda are on hand to ease us through the transitions.

Columbia's cinematic eye

by Venson Steadman

"It's like science fiction. It's fantastic!"

Followers of USC's Dr. Benjamin Dunlap, affectionately known as "Bernie" to friends and fans, don't have to hear more to know who's talking. With an intense squint of the eyes and a delivery that ranges from a low snarl to an incredulous, high-pitched declaration, Dunlap pounces on his subject with an energy that has kept USC film students fascinated over the past decade. Not only has his introductory "The Film Experience" course become one of the most popular offered by USC's English department -- turning on hordes of students to the serious study of film -- but Bernie has been a strong, encouraging force behind the work of local filmmakers as well.

Recently, however, Dunlap has found a new focus to this enthusiasm -- as host to the "Cinematic Eye" series showing Tuesday nights on South Carolina ETV. It's a rare offering for local film fans: at present the series is running a succession of British film classics with brief, two-minute introductions by Dunlap; however, next fall it will blossom into a full-scale ETV credit course, with two half-hour programs per week and 13 representative film masterpieces from "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" up to Ingmar Bergman.

So just how did "The Cinematic Eye" come about? As Dunlap tells it, the basic impetus for the show began more than a year ago when Janus, the 16 mm. film distributor, offered 100 movies out of its catalogue to PBS member stations at a minimum cost. Those stations could show the films whenever they liked, but had to take and pay for all 100 and show them within three years.

At first ETV balked at the cost -- over $30,000 for the entire S.C. system -- and declined to show the movies, but as it turned out (and to the surprise of many observers) that didn't mean the project was dead. "ETV was interested in finding a way to use the Janus package with the University," says Dunlap. "Gene Upright (ETV program director) called up and asked me to do a pilot introduction with one of their directors, Larry Lancet."

"...There is talk of eventually getting this series picked up on the national PBS network and one reason for such high hopes is the uniqueness of Dunlap's approach..."

As it turned out, ETV was so impressed with Dunlap's pilot that it not only took the Janus package, but signed him up as well. Currently on sabbatical from USC, he is creating a 13-week credit course that will weekly present a half-hour preview giving general background to a movie and then a half-hour in depth analysis of the film itself.

There is talk of eventually getting this series picked up on the national PBS network and one reason for such high hopes is the uniqueness of Dunlap's approach. Eschewing the talking head school of TV pedagogy and the lame intro and interview format of such shows as "Film Odyssey," Dunlap hopes to use film itself (or actually videotape and ETV's massive computer editing complex) to investigate and illuminate film -- to create a kind of video textbook. As Dunlap puts it, "Since film is primarily visual, there should be some way to talk about it visually...I hope we will demonstrate the possibility of examining film not in combination with the other arts but as a language of its own." To this end he has obtained excerpting rights for the entire catalogue of Janus movies -- many more than will be shown here -- and plans to use film clips as well as stills to show his subject's sources and influences rather than just talk about theory.

All of which may sound forbidding and educational, but don't worry: as Dunlap puts it, "We hope the shows will have independent entertainment value" -- rather like "The Men Who Made The Movies" -- and anyone who has ever sat in on one of Dunlap's film classes knows that he is rarely, if ever, boring. Gritting his teeth in that growl -- as though to grasp an idea by the scruff of the neck -- or running through an astonishingly eclectic series of references (his other speciality besides film is Victorian poetry), Dunlap turns knowledge and learning into the highest form of entertainment possible. Says Bernie, "I love show biz."

jeopardize some of these jobs, relatively low-paying as they are.

Other things attract foreign investors to South Carolina. The technical education system is often cited as an important selling point. Less widely known, but very attractive inducements include: the fact that South Carolina taxes only 6 percent of net corporate taxable income; that foreign corporations can own up to 50,000 acres in the state; that foreign firms enjoy a 5-year exemption from all county taxes save those for education; and that local financing is readily available. The Free-Trade Zone in Charleston also helps firms take advantage of cheap labor here to assemble goods, then ship them out duty-free.

The immediate question is, why has the economic benefit of foreign investment not filtered down to the working people? Why is our per capita income abysmally low?

A partial answer can be found in the failure of the state's political leadership to control the direction and nature of foreign investment; their failure to establish ways of making foreign investment accountable to the state's needs. What is needed is a long-range plan for industrial development which will not only coordinate the kinds of investment we get, but make it serve our needs. In our hunger for investment, we must not blindly accept whatever is offered; and, there are signs that the State Development Board is trying to attract investment in other than textile-related industries. In addition to diversifying, though, it is crucial that we establish political mechanisms to control the activities of foreign firms in South Carolina, and bring their operations into line with the real needs of the state.

Campaign '78: it's almost that time again

this early. So if you were looking for startling revelations or new, refined positions, forget it. That kind of honing remains to be completed.

Much attention, naturally, surrounded the enigmatic Ravenel, who still professes to having not made up his mind whether to run for governor or U.S. Senator. Most of his advisors and confidants seem to be advising a race against Strom Thurmond. But as Ravenel cautioned the crowd in his brief speech on campaign do's and don'ts, "you have to make the final decisions yourself," sometimes rejecting what the campaign "experts" tell you to do.

If nothing else, the lack of a decision keeps interest alive for all the candidates, especially Ravenel, as the speculation about what he will do continues. Since he does not enjoy the advantage of holding an elected position now, and can't compete with, say, Thurmond on the publicity level, he needs everything he can get.

Ravenel arrived looking tan and in close to playing shape, as one might expect an ex-Harvard quarterback to do. After Harvey and Riley had used their five-ten minutes time periods to address the crowd with such rhetorical questions as Harvey's "What do we (S.C.) do now?" and Riley's shortened version of Jimmy Carter's "Why not have a government as compassionate as the people?" speech, Ravenel read the crowd a letter he wrote to a candidate in another state. While the letter of advice provided no great insights ("Have your driver keep you supplied with fruits and juices," "always get enough rest") it was received as welcome relief after the more ponderous thoughts served up by Harvey and Riley. Ravenel is obviously determined not to get too heavy, too early in what promises to be the longest campaign in state history.

"I just feel that it's unwise to make a decision about a race that is still almost two years away," said Ravenel when pressed by WFBC-TV reporter Bob McAllister concerning which race he will choose. "So much can happen in a year or 18 months, I just don't wish to say what I'm going to do." Ravenel did promise a decision by late summer or early fall of this year, after saying a few months ago that he wouldn't decide until as late as December.

All of the candidates were long-time supporters of the equal rights amendment, and all favored retention of the controversial 14-B section of the Taft-Hartley act, but there were some disagreements on issues. Harvey is for building the Russell Dam, Ravenel against. "I'm for it because of the cost-benefit ratio, the millions of dollars that we've already spent on the project and the fact that we need hydro-generated electricity to off-set the state's dependence on Mideast oil," said Harvey. "I'm against it because of the environmental costs and because we have more important things to do with our money when the federal government is continuing to run huge spending deficits," said Ravenel. His comment opposing the dam caused about the only outburst of applause all night.

Harvey sought to invoke his position as lieutenant governor for a little leverage over non-office holders Ravenel and Riley when he discussed the ERA. He spoke of calling the White House to "give them the names of specific senators and representatives that might be called on."

There were questions on tax reform, and DSS and tidelands and education, perennial issues that nothing much ever seems to get done about. The answers were mostly reshaped versions of the '74 campaign.

But the basic mood was upbeat. The dividing lines between the candidates and their positions remain to be fully drawn, and the bitterness and competitiveness that will come later are absent now.

But if this is spring training, can the regular season be far behind?
